

FRANCE'S BIG GUNS USED IN TRAINING U.S. ARTILLERYMEN

By HEYWOOD BROWN.

(Special Copyrighted Cable to The Times.)
AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY
ARMY IN FRANCE, Oct. 12.—American coast artillerymen are in France training to fire guns bigger than the German "Bertha." Most of the men have had experience with big guns, but need practice in French methods and mechanical devices.

There are also a number of reserve officers in the camp. They had two months' training at Fort Monroe and will soon be almost as good as the best, because they have all had college technical training or its equivalent. Just now they are at school again, examining on French big guns and all the textbooks available. However, they need not depend on the books alone, for the camp contains specimens of most types of French artillery.

The pride of the contingent is a monster mounted on railroad trucks which fires a projectile weighing 3,800 pounds.

Big Gun With a Sting.

After the French custom, the big howitzer has been honored with a name. "Mosquito" is painted on the carriage in huge letters.
"We call her 'Mosquito,'" explained a French officer, "because she stings."
"Mosquito" has buzzed no less than 300 times at Verdun, but she has a number of stings left. The Americans detailed to this type of gun are loud in their praises and assert it to be the finest weapon in the world.
There are, however, however, who swear by "Petite Lulu," a snout howitzer which throws a shell higher than any mountain in America. There are champions also of "Gaby," a long-nosed creature which outranges all the rest.
"Gaby" can talk a little faster than any gun in camp, but her words carry less weight.

None of the guns is being fired yet, for first the Americans are going through the motions and learning the every detail of operation. Aeroplane observation will also have to be mastered before the big gunners are ready, but he coast artillerymen assert that their experience with naval guns is invaluable and that only a small amount of work will be necessary before they can attain the same accuracy against land targets as against sea ones.

Technical Training Essential.

Every one has a good word for the field officers assigned to the big guns.
The colonel in charge of the school said:

"Technical training is much more essential than military training for the big guns. Mathematics means more to us than the manual of arms.
That is why we need lots of new officers. It is generally impossible to heavy artillery to bring a man up from the ranks unless he has had a technical education. All the experience in the world won't help him much except to fire a gun, and that's no great trick."

There are many college athletes among the reservists. The most famous all-around football star ever turned out by Harvard is with the trench mortars, and a famous Crimson linebacker has been assigned to the same work. The assignment of younger officers to mortars, howitzers and rifles was done by lot.
French mortars were considered the least desirable branch, but the men with the mortars won't admit it now.

"Doughboys" Tired in Trenches.

Typical "doughboys" came out of their practice trenches this morning after two days and nights, during which the weather behaved like a Boche.
The enemy was absent, but the elements did their best to make up for this lack by pelting the soldiers first with rain and then with sleet.

A driving wind made the soldiers only too eager to keep their heads down. Conditions of actual warfare were carried out as far as possible.
There were relief patrols and brief sessions in the dugouts during a theoretical intense bombardment.

The experiment served to test the new American field kitchens, which combine several features taken from other army models. The cook did well with his new contrivance, and managed to keep the men tolerably cheerful with frequent rations of hot soup, stew, and coffee.
